

WHEN THE WORLD FREEZES, WE DON'T

We're in the middle of a deep freeze—days of below-zero temperatures and wind chills that turn the air sharp and dangerous. Most of us are doing what you should do in weather like this: staying inside, layering up, and keeping time outdoors to a minimum.

But for animals left outside—lost, dumped, abandoned, or simply forgotten—there is no “waiting it out.” No warm car. No door that swings open at the right moment. In weather like this, time isn't measured in hours. It's measured in survival.

While the region freezes, rescue shifts into high gear. Our volunteers become weatherproof in the way only people with soft hearts and stubborn determination can. They drive roads most people avoid. They carry traps, blankets, treats, leashes, carriers—and hope. They do outside activities in the kind of cold that steals your breath, because somewhere out there is an animal whose body is already doing everything it can just to stay alive.

Finding the animal is only part of the story. Sometimes it takes hours. Sometimes it takes multiple tries. And when the moment finally comes—when the trap door closes, the leash slips on, or the carrier latches—you can almost feel the whole team exhale.

Then comes the part most people never see. Intake isn't glamorous, but it's love in a thousand small actions: a weight check, a meal gently offered. It's flea treatment, medications, and baths that turn the water dark. It's warm blankets, quiet voices, slow movements, and constant cleaning—over and over again.

It's also the messy, unfiltered side of rescue: mange and fleas, parvo worries, ringworm, coughs, limps, and wounds that stay with you. It's cleaning up what sickness leaves behind, then disinfecting everything—again. It's scrubbing kennels and mopping floors, running endless loads of laundry, and making late-night vet runs followed by early-morning check-ins.

And then, we watch. It's small, but we recognize it every time: the animal finally rests. You can see it in the way they sink into a blanket like they've been holding themselves up for weeks. It's one of the quiet miracles of rescue—when survival turns into relief.

Rescue One-Liners

“Are you trying to set some kind of state record with dog rescues this month?”

We give a lot of love in rescue—and we get so much back.

We all know not every story ends the way we want. Our rescue receives more pleas for help than most people can imagine. We see picture after picture of animals in need and want to save them all. We try. We push. We stretch. And still, sometimes, we're too late. Sometimes an animal is too sick, too injured, or too far gone and heartbreak arrives faster than help.

That's the part rescue doesn't share as often, but it's real. It's heavy. And it's carried quietly by people who keep showing up anyway.

Hope isn't pretending the hard parts don't exist. Hope is walking straight into them—again and again. It's pulling on one more coat and heading back out with a trap. It's the foster who says “yes” to just one more, even when they're exhausted. It's the late-night drive to the emergency vet and the early-morning check that follows. It's neighbors sharing a post, dropping off supplies, or giving so we can answer “yes” when the next call comes in. In weather like this—when the cold is ruthless—hope is a whole team of people refusing to look away.

And because of it, animals who would not have made it through these temperatures are now sleeping in safety—finally warm, finally fed, finally able to rest.

Thank you for being part of the community that makes that possible. Every share, every donation, every foster application, every message of support—it all matters.

In weather like this, it matters more than ever.

GIVING HEARTS DAY

SHOW YOUR LOVE!

Giving Hearts Day is one of those rare days that reminds us what's possible when a community comes together. For 24 hours, people across the region rally around the causes they care about—supporting hundreds of participating nonprofits through one easy, secure giving platform.

For our rescue, Giving Hearts Day doesn't just help, it changes outcomes. It means more animals get help sooner. It means fewer animals suffer in silence. And it means we can invest in the kind of work that stops the crisis before it starts: prevention.

Why prevention matters

Unplanned litters can quickly turn into hunger, illness, and homelessness. The need grows fast—and once it's here, it's heartbreaking and seemingly impossible to untangle. That's why spay and neuter is one of the most compassionate, effective tools we have.

Right now, we spay/neuter over 1,000 animals each year. This Giving Hearts Day, we're raising $80,000 to expand those efforts, so fewer animals ever reach the point of needing rescue.

The impact you make is real

We want you to know that your gift doesn't just support a rescue—it supports results. Because of donors like you, we can:

- prevent suffering before it starts
- help families and communities with accessible spay/neuter resources
- reduce overcrowding and strain on shelters and pounds
- give animals a healthier start and a better chance at a loving home

With so many worthy causes...

There are many incredible organizations taking part in Giving Hearts Day and we're honored to be part of that community of good. With so many worthy causes, we know every gift is a meaningful choice—if you're able to support our rescue this Giving Hearts Day, we'd be truly grateful.

If you've ever donated, shared a post, fostered, volunteered, adopted, or simply cared—thank you. You are the reason prevention is possible. And you are the reason fewer animals have to be rescued at all.

Meet Jasper,

You'd never know it now, but Jasper had a rough start. What he's chosen to be anyway is the best kind of reminder: dogs don't dwell, they live. And Jasper lives with his whole heart.

This spunky guy has one speed: FUN! He's full of personality, always ready for his next adventure, and he'd thrive in an active home where he can burn energy, play hard and soak up all the love.

Jasper may do well with other dogs with a proper introduction, but fair warning - anyone who meets him tends to fall head over heels pretty fast.

WHEN YOU SEE SOMETHING, SAY SOMETHING

We recently took in two dogs from the local impound who were severely emaciated—so thin it's hard to describe without your stomach dropping. Their photos, as heart-breaking as they are, tell the truth: suffering like this doesn't happen overnight.

Here's the part we can change—together.

These dogs came from a home where there were multiple animals in need. Not everyone feels safe speaking up. Sometimes people worry about being wrong. Sometimes they fear conflict or retribution. Sometimes they assume someone else will call. But animals can't always wait for "someone else."

If you ever see an animal in obvious distress—extreme thinness, injuries, no shelter, no water, untreated illness—please report it. Call Animal Control or your local law enforcement non-emergency line and request a welfare check. You don't need proof. You don't need to investigate. You just need to make the call.

That call can be the moment an animal finally gets a chance.
